STAR WARS

BY AARON DERR

Like everybody else (in their right mind), Brian Semling, author of Everything You Need To Know About Collecting Star Wars Collectibles, grew up loving everything about "Star Wars."

He bought the toys, took them out of the packages and played with them in the yard, in the sandbox, in the street. Some were broken. Some lost. The rest sold at a garage sale. And for a while, "Star Wars" was forgotten. Then, sometime in the early '90s, it all came back.

"I was watching TV one night, and 'Return of the Jedi' just happened to be on," Semling says. "It brought back the nostalgia of being a kid again. I remembered how much I liked the films, and how much I liked the toys."

And just as Brian was getting his Star Wars-collecting feet wet, the market exploded. There was the 1991 release of "Heir to the Empire," the first of three novels by science fiction author Timothy Zahn that served as the licensed continuation of the Star Wars saga. Then there was the 1997 re-release of the original trilogy of films, a Special Edition of "Star Wars" that got everybody fired up again.

And now, as Star Wars memorabilia collecting reaches a fevered pitch, official word has come of a new series of films. "Star Wars: Episode I" hits theaters in the spring of 1999.

"I always liked the idea of the good guy versus the bad guy," Semling says. "There was always a certain element of the Star Wars characters that you could relate to. It's not exactly a realistic film, but it's not totally impossible, either. It's something that could really have happened a long time ago, in a galaxy far, far away."

And at the heart of it all is a bunch of people who just love toys. You have to admit, at the least, those things are pretty cool. The 3 3/4-inch Luke Skywalker with the yellow lightsaber that telescoped out of the hand was no match for what any other kid called an action figure. And whoever owned the 12-inch Boba Fett had one of the more intimidating playthings on the block.

Star Wars collecting is, in a word, huge. There are people who will do anything within reason for a vinyl-caped Jawa. And can you blame them? How could you resist the chance to own a piece of one of the most celebrated, influential, trend-setting, ground-breaking films ever?

"Star Wars" is, in its simplest and purest form, a wonderful, fascinating story. It's a classic mythological tale about good guys and bad guys, and everything the bad guys can do wrong, and everything the good guys can do to stop them.

It's about why it's OK to follow your dreams if you're unhappy with the life you currently lead, and how a lightsaber is better than that clumsy, random blaster any day.

It's about why you must be sure and wait until you're ready to confront your demons, and how a Tauntaun can actually smell worse on the inside.

It's about why, in the end, it's OK to have faith in your friends, and how it's OK to seek out the good in others.

Inside the pages of this book is everything you need to know about collecting Star Wars collectibles. This is how you can join that wonderful universe. So read on. Beware of the Dark Side. Don't be afraid to take your toys out of the boxes and play with them. Take them into the yard, or the sandbox, if you wish.

And, of course, know in your heart that the Force will be with you . . .

Always.

Aaron Derr, an editor with Beckett Publications, still remembers getting out of school early and standing in line for hours the first time he saw "Star Wars." His favorite collectibles, a 3 3/4-inch C-3PO and R2-D2 from the vintage original Star Wars line, sit next to his computer terminal at work.

COLLECTIBLES

The Star Wars universe came to life, in a way no one could ever have possibly imagined, on May 25, 1977. In the days after the George Lucas film was released in two U.S. cities to sell-out crowd after sell-out crowd, the euphoria spread. Within weeks, “Star Wars” was dominating theaters around the country, and in doing so, capturing the hearts of millions of fans.

The film was aimed at male adolescents, but it proved to be popular among all groups. Why?

“Star Wars” is based on a fairly basic mythological model. Most myths have several similar elements, including a good, innocent, and perhaps unlikely hero; a decisively evil and overwhelming force that the hero must overcome; and other usual suspects such as adventure, intrigue and romance. And that’s just the highlights.

“Star Wars” takes the basic elements of a successful myth and transplants them into what was at the time a whole new element: outer space. Add to the mix revolutionary special effects, a brilliant supporting cast of creative aliens and exotic venues, a good core of actors, a great creator / director, and enthusiastic and memorable music, and you have one of the greatest and successful epic stories of all time.

“Star Wars” reached to the heart of millions of kids (and adults who wished to be kids again) and enticed their imaginations with a story that invites you in and instantly makes you feel as if it is real. As a child, I remember thinking there could not possibly be any greater toy than that of a working lightsaber. The grace and power of the lightsaber tapped into the desire of every child to fight and conquer evil villains.

The flamboyant Han Solo was probably the most enjoyable character and was realistic enough in his strengths and faults to become the favorite among most males.

Luke Skywalker was the innocent farm boy who always did what his conscience told him, and often tried to sway others to act in the proper light. Ben Kenobi was the mysterious teacher who was respected in spite of his unimpressive appearance. And of course, Darth Vader was the perfect villain, clad in black with the most powerful of voices and the most ominous appearance. With the unparalleled success of the movie came an insatiable demand for Star Wars products of all kinds. Due to the lack of anticipation of such overwhelming consumer lust, very few licensed products were available during 1977.

That soon changed. The major force behind the manufacturing of Star Wars memorabilia was Kenner, a company that produced a few puzzles and board games just in time for Christmas of 1977.

The most popular line of Kenner products was the set of action figures based on an average height of 3 3/4-inches. These figures were not ready in time for Christmas 1977, so Kenner produced a mail-in certificate, known as the Early Bird certificate, which could be redeemed for four action figures as soon as they became available in early 1978.

Die-cast replicas such as this X-Wing aren't as popular as the larger vehicles, but there's no denying Yak Face, which will go for $175 loose and a whopping $2,000 in the box.

Boba Fett is still one of the trilogy's most popular characters. His 12-inch figure lists at $200 loose. A variation of Han Solos (notice the size of the head) makes things interesting for heads-up collectors.

This first Kenner toy product included four action figures packaged in small plastic bags and then placed in a white tray and mailer box. The four figures included Luke with a telescoping lightsaber, Princess Leia, R2-D2, and Chewbacca with a green crossbow.

Shortly after the Early Bird Kits were produced, Kenner released a set of 12 action figures on cardboard cards with plastic bubbles. The first set included Luke Skywalker, Han Solo, Princess Leia, Obi-Wan Kenobi, Darth Vader, C-3PO, R2-D2, Jawa, Stormtrooper, Death Squad Commander, Tusken Raider and Chewbacca.

To this day, the most valuable of the first 12 are the vinyl-caped Jawa and the Han Solo. The first Jawa was produced with a vinyl or plastic cape similar to Ben Kenobi's but was soon changed to a more aesthetically pleasing cloth cape. Due to very low production numbers, the vinyl-caped Jawa has become one of the most sought after Star Wars collectibles today. In the package it will command between $2,000 and $4,000.

The Han Solo figure was originally produced with a smaller head that was changed to a regular-sized head toward the end of the of the 12-back release. The small-head Han Solo is typically more popular and will sell for $400-$700, but the large-head Han Solo is rarer and usually will sell for slightly higher.

After the release, and ensuing success, of the first 12 figures, Kenner released eight new figures. Eventually Boba Fett was to become the 21st figure and was released on a Star Wars card even though he was never seen in the first Star Wars movie. Boba Fett has proven to be one of the most popular Star Wars characters over the years. Though his on-camera time is minimal, he has a great appeal due to his image, skill and reputation. The Star Wars Boba Fett, his first issued figure, will sell for about $1,200.

Toys other than the 3 3/4-inch action figures were produced by Kenner in the late 1970s, including several action play sets and various vehicles and accessories designed to accompany the action figures. The play sets helped to fully recreate scenes from the movie with the Death Star, the Cantina and the desert of Tatooine. Most of the influential and memorable space vehicles from the movie were recreated, such as the Millennium Falcon, the Landspeeder, the Tie Fighter, Darth Vader's Tie Fighter, the X-Wing and the Sandcrawler.

Besides toys for the 3 3/4-inch line, Kenner also produced a 12-inch action figure line. The well-done series of 12-inch figures were too large to make vehicles or play sets for, and over time did not prove to be as popular as the 3 3/4-inch figures. The line was discontinued after the release of IG-88 in 1980.

This AT-ST, along with the other large accessories, was designed to hold 3 3/4-inch action figures. The new Luke vs. Wampa set is already proving to be a hot item.

But shortly thereafter, the 12-inch figures became collectibles. By 1985, figures such as the IG-88, Boba Fett and Han Solo were already selling for hundreds of dollars in mint-sealed boxes. Today, the 12-inch line is very popular due to its high quality and level of nostalgia. The rarest of the 12-inch figures (and perhaps, along with Boba Fett, the coolest) is the IG-88, which is valued at $8000-$1,000 in a mint-sealed box.

Even out of the package, IG-88 will sell for around $400.

In 1980, Lucas released "The Empire Strikes Back," which at the time was the most successful sequel in movie history. Though it grossed less than "Star Wars" and "Return of the Jedi," a large contingent of fans consider the second Star Wars film to be their favorite.

The second part of a trilogy is always difficult and usually ends without a decisive conclusion. "The Empire Strikes Back" was no different, as the Rebel heroes start the film in a struggle for existence and end it barely surviving to fight another day. The film is filled with many great twists, such as Darth Vader's revelation that he is Luke's father, and introduces many new memorable characters, such as the instantly recognizable Yoda.

"The Empire Strikes Back" spawned a whole new wave of memorabilia, featuring 29 new action figures along with many play sets, vehicles and accessories. Also for "The Empire Strikes Back," a new collection was produced called the Micro Collection, which consisted of small plastic play sets and vehicles with 1-inch die-cast metal figures. The idea was moderately successful but was discontinued in 1982 before the release of the next Star Wars film.

The exciting conclusion to the trilogy, "Return of the Jedi," was highly anticipated and delivered strongly. Originally, it was to be called Revenge of the Jedi, and a limited amount of items produced with a Revenge of the Jedi logo have become highly collectible today. The film was the perfect conclusion to the greatest trilogy of all time: the classic struggle of good finally overcoming evil in a fight to the death. The special effects were even better. And, of course, the Ewoks were a new alien race to be loved by all kids and collectors.

After “Return of the Jedi” and the ensuing release of related memorabilia, another series of Kenner action figures was launched. Called Power of the Force, each figure in the series came with an aluminum collector’s coin. Overall, the packing was very well done, which has helped to make it very popular today.

Some of the rarest of all of the Star Wars figures are included in the Power of the Force line. Not as many figures were produced compared to those from the other series due to lack of demand in 1984 and shortly thereafter, but this relatively low level of production has made the line quite valuable in and out of the package. In the package, Anakin Skywalker and Yak Face will sell for $1,500 to $2,500 each. Out of the package, Yak Face will sell for more than $150 and the Luke Skywalker in Stormtrooper Disguise will sell for about $100 to $150.

Also in 1984, Kenner released a series of Ewoks cartoon series figures and Droids cartoon series figures related to the children’s cartoon TV series. Though the shows were never very popular, the figures have proven to be quite in demand. By far the most sought after piece from these two lines is the Boba Fett on Droids card, which will sell for more than $600.

After 1984, there was a lull in Star Wars collecting that lasted nearly 10 years. Star Wars toys and memorabilia simply sat on the shelves dur-

STAR WARS

COLLECTOR SERIES

Due to some of the most advanced technology in the galaxy, the Empire needed a vehicle which could be used on all terrains. Designers resorted to ancient technology and applied it to a large scale for combat vehicles. The fastest AT-AT, AT-Terran Armored Transport walkers surpassed Imperial expectations, virtually unstoppable as weapons platforms.

Acting as transports for Imperial ground troops and light vehicles, these beastly machines were used to crush and demoralize enemy forces thereby forming the core of many Imperial ground assaults.

Driving an Imperial AT-Terran Armored Transport requires great skill which can only be acquired through rigorous training and practice. "Ground pilots" train in teams of two, learning to handle the behemoths in conjunction with a combat coordinator. While one pilot drives the monstrous machine, the second pilot assists as a navigator and gunner.

General Veers, when assembling his legion of "Hammer," chose only the best-trained and best-equipped troops in the Imperial Army. During their training, the teams live and work in their walker over much of each mission. The trainees even get involved with the maintenance of the AT-AT walker.

The command crew works in the compact, crowded cockpit which is located in the "head" of the machine. The weapons are also located in this section, as well as holographic targeting systems which allow the gunner and driver a 360° view of their position. The crew is trained to use the walkers for blaster "shock" attacks, landing at great distances but in plain sight of the enemy.

It was this machine monster and its group of bravely trained crews that carried out the devastating assault on Hoth.

Authentically styled straight from The Empire Strikes Back, the AT-AT driver features his highly detailed, adverse weather protection suit complete with helmet, chest respirator, boots, comlink and Imperial blaster. This special edition 12" figure, available for the first time ever, is destined to become a classic collectible.

Collectors are often tempted to pursue some obscure variations, such as the elusive vinyl-caped Jawa (replica shown here). Chewbacca came with a blue or green crossbow.

ing the mid-80s, and no new items were produced. Interest began to soar again with the release of a trilogy of books by Timothy Zahn starting in 1992. Speculation continued to grow over the next Star Wars trilogy, and Star Wars collecting, especially concerning the 3 3/4-inch action figures and accessories, again grew rapidly.

In 1995, Kenner began to produce a new line of 3 3/4-inch action figures that has continued very strongly to the present. In 1996, Kenner began a new 12-inch action figure series that has grown in popularity since its inception. Many newer Kenner toys have already been selling for many times their original retail value. For instance, a Luke Skywalker: Jedi Knight figure with the brown vest will sell for $50 to $70 (originally $5) and a 12-inch Chewy will sell for $50 to $100 (originally $20).

The re-release of the Star Wars trilogy in early 1997 created a new level of excitement in the area of Star Wars collectibles, and an incredible surge of new collectors entered the marketplace. Prices of Star Wars collectibles has steadily increased, and with the new trilogy on the horizon, a steady increase over the next several years can be expected.

The first films, actually Episodes IV, V and VI in a much longer story by Lucas, was for many of us more than a set of three movies. It was a fantasy world in which our dreams of adventure and excitement could be lived out through our friends Luke, Leia, Han, Chewy and the rest of the gang. And now we wait for Episode I and the new Star Wars prequels.

We're certainly ready for the release of another great trilogy which we hope will also reach a new level of historic proportion. The new films will not replace the existing trilogy, but hopefully add to it. We wait like those kids more than 20 years ago to see, once again, the famous opening phrase, "A long time ago, in a galaxy far, far away ..."

HOW TO COLLECT STAR WARS COLLECTIBLES

How does one go about collecting Star Wars items? What is the best way? What is the right way? Beginning Star Wars collectors should start with items that are most appealing to them. If Darth Vader is your favorite character, then begin with Darth Vader items, from the 3 3/4-inch action figures to the 12-inch figures. It is probably best to start with less expensive items, rather than the rarest and most expensive of figures, as you are getting a feel for collecting.

Does size matter?
The 12-inch Darth Vader (right) is harder to find and worth more than the small figure.

After collecting for a few weeks, or months, and talking with fellow Star Wars enthusiasts and dealers, you will begin to see how other people collect so that you can better decide what pattern is best for you. Some people try to collect one of everything that has ever been made. Others focus just on a character such as Darth Vader or Boba Fett.

You may choose to collect solely variations or rare items. Or you may choose to concentrate on a specific part of the universe that is Star Wars toys and try to complete a specific set. A common example would be to collect the first 12 figures either in or out of the package. A loose set of 12 will run just more than $200, while a complete set of carded items will run $2,000 to more than $3,000. My advice is to start with what you like and start small enough that you won't regret your purchase later.

Should one collect in or out of the package? The answer depends on the collector. Do you prefer mint unopened toys or out-of-package items that can be displayed and set up. Also, consider that packaged items will typically cost at least twice as much as unpackaged items. Many collectors ultimately decided to collect items both in and out of the package.

The value is simply a result of supply and demand. An item's value will be determined by the willingness of collectors to buy and sell that item. If many people are interested in buying a specific item and its supply is limited, then the price will tend to increase. If more people are selling a specific item than buying it, the price will go down.

Items such as the vinyl-caped Jawa get almost all of their value from scarcity, or low supply. However, the low availability itself will in turn often raise the demand for the item. For example, many people want to own the vinyl-caped Jawa or Power of the Force Anakin Skywalker because they are so rare. Some items are not incredibly rare, like most of the Boba Fett memorabilia, but due to the incredible demand, are valued much higher than similar items for other characters.

The new vehicles, such as Darth Vader's Tie Fighter, might offer more gadgets and gizmos, but there's still something appealing about the older items, such as the original Ben Kenobi.

The price guide in Everything You Need To Know About Collecting Star Wars Collectibles is based on current market values for complete items out of the package and mint items in the original package. Of course, prices will vary greatly by condition.

Most action figure toys will be graded on a “C” scale of 1-10. Perfect mint is a 10, whereas 9 is a near-mint to mint condition. The listed prices in this book are for items in C9 condition. The item does not need to be perfect to be a 9, but it must be clean and free of obvious and noticeable flaws. A C8 piece will have some noticeable wear, but overall will be in a very presentable condition. A C7 collectible will typically denote something that is an average condition and will have noticeable wear, but will not be broken or have any detrimental flaws. With a C6 item, you'll see even more prevalent wear, but the piece is still intact. An item in the C5 range is fairly damaged, and by the time we get to C1, the piece is no longer considered to be in collectible condition.

R2-D2 got its sensorscope after "The Empire Strikes Back," but Han Solo made sure Greedo wouldn't need any updates after "Star Wars."

Finally, though most collecting is done for fun, one should keep in mind that buying Star Wars toys and memorabilia is also an investment. It is very possible that the prices will fluctuate, though most items have tended to increase in value over time. Certainly, there is no guarantee of what will happen to prices over time, and collectibles are not recommended to be seen strictly as investments.

However, it can be very fun to watch the value of your collection appreciate over the years.

Figure variations always keep things interesting. The first Snaggletooth was incorrectly tall and blue before the more accurate short red figure came out. This Bespin Security Guard also came as a black figure.

The Millennium Falcon remains one of the trilogy's most popular ships. The new Falcon toy features extra lights, sounds and battle scars that weren't available with the vintage piece.

VINTAGE ACTION FIGURES & PRICE GUIDE

From the vinyl-caped Jawa to the Luke Skywalker with the telescoping lightsaber, nothing compares to the original Star Wars action figures.

When collecting the older 3 3/4-inch Star Wars action figures, the ones released from 1977 to 1985, the first thing to look at is the condition of the piece. Obviously, for items this old, it's getting harder and harder to find collections fully intact, in good condition and with all the appropriate weapons.

For most people, the items need to be in close-to-mint condition. One thing that's important to realize is that once the figures are out of the package, you can't always tell which package they came from. For instance, a Darth Vader from the Star Wars series in a Star Wars package is exactly the same as a Darth Vader from a The Empire Strikes Back package or a Return of the Jedi package.

In the Star Wars series, three pieces are the most expensive and the most sought after by collectors: the vinyl-caped Jawa, the Luke Skywalker with the telescoping lightsaber and the blue Snaggleteeth that came in the Sears Cantina Adventure Set.

With the Jawa, only a limited number were produced with the vinyl cape before the manufacturers went with a cloth-like cape. With scarcity came plenty of demand, and the value of the vinyl-caped Jawa skyrocketed. The scenario for the Luke with the telescoping lightsaber is similar: after a few shipments, the lightsaber was glued in and could not be retracted.

The blue Snaggleteeth is rare because it was only available in the Sears set. It was never released on a card, so it's only available loose out of the package, although some collectors try to find it in its original Kenner plastic bag. Later Snaggleteeth figures, released on cards in the regular sets, were red and are still popular but much more available and therefore less valuable.

The Power of the Force series was an extra set of figures that came out well after the release of "Return of the Jedi." They were not related to a particular movie and basically included several of the characters that had been left out of the earlier series. Most collectors agree that they're very nice looking pieces, and the coins that they came with make them unique.

This series was produced in 1984, just when Star Wars collecting was starting to fade in popularity. With the lack of demand at the time, there were not very many Power of the Force figures released, so today, they're very much in demand and high in value. A lot of Star Wars collectors at the time didn't bother with the Power of the Force series. The lack of production and high demand translates into higher prices. A lot of the figures from that set are now more valuable than the figures from the original Star Wars set.

The coins that came with the old Power of the Force line are highly collected. Out of 63 coins, only 36 were released with the figures on the cards. The rest had to be purchased via a mail-in to Kenner. At the time, if you called the company, you could have purchased the entire set for $29.99. Now, that same set will sell for $3,000. Each of the mail-in coins go for anywhere from $50 to $100. The Boba Fett coin is worth upwards of $200.

Some of the more popular figures tend to be the ones that didn't have huge roles in the movies, such as Boba Fett. Those rare characters tend to be more mysterious. Although Boba Fett had a somewhat larger role in "Return of the Jedi" compared to the other bounty hunters introduced in "The Empire Strikes Back," no one could have ever predicted that he would become one of the most popular characters in the entire trilogy.

Boba Fett's popularity comes from his roguish image as the most feared bounty hunter in the galaxy. The occupation of a bounty hunter is certainly intriguing and appealing to young adult males. Boba Fett is in effect an outlaw, and most of all a guy who's really cool.

Another hot commodity is the 12-inch action figures, the most popular of which is the IG-88 figure, along with the Boba Fett and Han Solo pieces. These figures are quite large and, unlike the smaller 3 3/4-inch figures, were never intended to be compatible with ships or play sets or the like. Regardless, they've found quite a home in the hearts of collectors and are becoming more and more popular, even rivaling the popularity of the smaller figures in some circles.

NEW ACTION FIGURES & PRICE GUIDE

With more detail and more muscle, the new line of action figures was at first greeted with some resentment but has since caught on among Star Wars collectors.

he new Power of the Force series, first released in 1995, was named after the now-popular original Power of the Force series in the mid-'80s. The new set is often referred to as the Power of the Force II series.

Power of the Force II was released about a year and a half before the Special Edition re-release of the trilogy in early 1997. If the mid- to late-'80s was the down cycle of Star Wars collecting, the early '90s was when it picked up steam again. Some credit the renewed interest to the publication of a trilogy of Lucasfilm-licensed books by Timothy Zahn. With the release of the novels came discussion among fans of the original films and the possibility of brand new Star Wars films on the horizon.

With increased discussion of the films came renewed interest in the memorabilia, and Star Wars collecting took off. Interest in collecting Star Wars-related items is at an all-time high, and with the upcoming release of the prequels, there seems to be no limit, especially when one considers the possibility of brand new collectibles with characters related to the new films.

The first thing you notice about the new line of figures is that they're much more muscular and modern-looking. The view of the new figures compared to the old figures has changed in recent years. At first, perhaps there was a little resentment and some people were disappointed. But as the figures have gotten better, collectors are starting to find more room on their shelves for the new toys.

A good example is the new Princess Leia figures. Most people would agree that the first Princess Leia figure released in the '90s was not a good portrayal of Princess Leia, but the following figures truly do bear a strong resemblance, as they should.

Also, the new 12-inch figures have become extremely popular, again rivaling the popularity of the smaller figures. In the new Power of the Force 12-inch collection, the Boba Fett and Chewbacca figures are the most popular and most sought after. Some of the other items might go for a higher price since they were offered exclusively through certain stores and therefore have smaller production figures.

Now, the new figures are widely accepted among Star Wars collectors and are very highly sought after. The quality is certainly excellent. Most collectors can still appreciate the older items while also enjoying the new ones that are different but still a lot of fun.

It's a big change, and perhaps at first the figures were just too much different from the old ones.

Some people probably didn't think it was a good idea to produce new figures in the first place, but in general those feelings have faded and collectors have embraced the new line of products.

VEHICLES PLAY SETS ACCESSORIES DIE CASTS & PRICE GUIDE

If it flies, walks, speeds or crawls, there's a toy for it. A-Wings, AT-ATs and Air Speeders are all represented in the vintage and new lines of Star Wars-related accessories.

K

enner released numerous Star Wars vehicles when the movies first came out, then released another series of vehicles with the new Power of the Force line.

Most of the newer items are very similar to the older ones. They've adjusted some of the color schemes so that what was a solid gray or white color before now has a little more detail such as battle-damaged scars and marks. Otherwise, the ships are virtually the same.

Vehicle collecting is not as popular as action figure collecting. The older vehicles are more collectible, since you can still go to toy stores today and find the new vehicles. A lot of the cooler ships were made in the '70s and '80s. Some of the more popular vintage vehicles include the Radio-Controlled Jawa Sandcrawler from "Star Wars," a fairly expensive and rare piece that was really well done.

There are a lot of nice vehicles from the original Return of the Jedi collection, including the Imperial Shuttle. Another piece that is real popular, but also real rare, is the Tatooine Skiff, which was included in the 1984 Power of the Force series. The Skiff depicted the scene from "Return of the Jedi" with Luke Skywalker and the Sarlaac Pit. Another hot vehicle is the Y-Wing Fighter, which wasn't released until the Return of the Jedi set, despite the vehicle's inclusion in "Star Wars."

In addition to the large vehicles, which were designed to incorporate the 3 3/4-inch action figures, there was also a set of smaller die-cast vehicles, although they tend to not be as popular among collectors. Die-cast collectors tend to be a unique bunch: not many people who collect the action figures collect the die-cast, and vice versa. In general, the die-cast items are fairly inexpensive, so it could provide an affordable entry into the hobby for the more budget-conscious collector.

By far the most desirable die-cast item is the Tie Bomber, which was a very limited release and was never offered in the larger format. The Bomber goes for about $300 out of the package and anywhere from $600 to $1,500 in the package.

In addition to the larger plastic vehicles and the medium-sized die-casts, there was also a Micro Collection, a group of 1-inch die-cast metal figures that represented ships and machines from the films. The pieces are fairly well done and are somewhat popular among collectors, although they still aren't as sought after as the large-scale items.

EVERYTHING ELSE & CHECKLIST

You name it, and there's a Star Wars collectible: cookie jars, alarm clocks, bookmarks, drinking glasses and trading cards. And that's just the beginning.

ny toy-related Star Wars item is popular these days and is sure to be sought after by a collector somewhere. In fact, even the cardboard display used in stores to sell the first 12 figures is a hot item, now selling for close to $1,000. But there are thousands of non-toy items out there as well that make nice collectibles.

One of the first places to start is printed materials. There have been literally hundreds of publications related to “Star Wars.” From comic books to science fiction magazines to posters, a collector could fill plenty of rooms with nothing but printed items.

Some of the most popular books are the original three novels, especially “Star Wars: From the Adventures of Luke Skywalker” by George Lucas, which appeared as a softcover novel nine months before “Star Wars” hit theaters. “The Empire Strikes Back” novel was written by Donald F. Glut, and “Return of the Jedi” was written by James Kahn.

The success of the films prompted the release of multiple Star Wars-related science fiction novels, most of which followed the adventures of the original characters to new and different places. In fact, the middle part of the '90s was a fertile time for Star Wars novels, especially Timothy Zahn’s “Heir to the Empire” trilogy that followed the characters after the events of “Return of the Jedi.”

In addition to novels, the Star Wars universe has been expanded upon in coloring books, activity books, information books and just about everything else imaginable. The book collecting market is quite different from the toy market. In most cases, you likely won’t have to pay much more than the face value of the book. One of the books that is worth more than what it sold for when it came out is the hardcover edition of the first novel by George Lucas. In good condition, it sells these days for $20 to $50.

There are so many different Star Wars books and comics, one could spend years trying to piece together a comprehensive collection, especially if you include major magazines that featured the films, such as the “Time” cover with George Lucas.

Trading cards offer another attractive collecting niche. In conjunction with the original Star Wars film, there was a 330-card set released in 1977 by the Topps company that featured subsets broken down by the color of the border: blue, red, yellow, green and orange. This is the most popular and most well known group of cards, and an entire set is now worth $150 to $350.

Subsequently, there were additional sets released for each of the next two films. The Empire Strikes Back and Return of the Jedi sets are not as hard to find and usually will sell for $20 to $30.

In recent years, more trading cards have been released, including the Star Wars Galaxy 1, Star Wars Galaxy 2 and Star Wars Galaxy 3 sets from Topps. These are fairly valuable, with a complete set in excellent condition running up to $1,000.

Millennium Falcon Plate

From a visual standpoint, the newer cards are much more attractive than the older ones. Modern technology allows the companies to achieve special effects now that weren't possible when “Star Wars” first came out.

Another popular aspect of collecting is movie posters. The most valuable posters are the actual promotional ones displayed in theaters to advertise the films. Some of the more interesting and unique (and therefore more sought after and valuable) posters are the ones featuring “Revenge of the Jedi,” the original title of the third installment in the trilogy. These are tough find and will go for $400 if they're in good shape.

The original Star Wars poster is certainly a hot item (and will sell for up to $1,000), as is the Happy Birthday poster made for theaters that were still showing the film a year after its original release date. Because of the abundance that have been produced over the years, posters offer a good start into Star Wars collecting. Prices are generally down, and they're generally easy to come by. Any store that sells movie posters will most certainly have a Star Wars item or two.

In addition to the promotional posters, many magazines included pull-out posters. Most of these aren't true collectibles because so many were produced, but they're easy to come by and certainly look nice on your wall. Many of the magazine posters look as sharp as the theatrical posters, but because of the supply, they don't carry the same value. The "Star Wars Official Poster Monthly" originals are reasonably priced and somewhat easy to find and offer a good source of posters.

If printed materials aren't what you're looking for, there are countless other non-toy-related Star Wars collectibles out there that aren't that hard to find and won't cost you an arm and a leg.

In the late '70s and early '80s, if you could think of something that could have the Star Wars logo on it, you could find it somewhere. Swing sets, furniture, cups, banks, ceramics, toys, clothing and literally thousands of knickknacks were available to a Star Wars-hungry public. You could literally decorate your entire house, from bed sheets to cups and plates, with Star Wars memorabilia.

Typically, the random Star Wars-related items don't have much value, with a few exceptions. Adam Joseph Industries produced a Gamorrean Guard vinyl bank that is extremely rare and will sell for several hundred dollars.

There are multiple ceramic items from the Sigma company that are fairly collectible, including salt and pepper shakers and figurines. The Yoda salt and pepper shakers and the R2-D2 and R5-D4 salt and pepper shakers are very rare, and anything that features Boba Fett is usually highly sought after.

Other collectible items include Halloween costumes, board games, puzzles, cups, mugs, models and watches.

One rather unique niche of Star Wars collecting is bootleg items. Some of the items from China and the Eastern European countries are fairly nice looking and highly sought after by those collectors who have to have one of everything. One of the most popular items is the line of figures from Turkey, which were not licensed by Lucasfilm Ltd. There are some minor changes that differentiate those figures from the licensed Kenner products. For instance, The Hoth Stormtrooper is blue and is called Blue Stars. In the package, it will sell for up to $1,000.

Another interesting niche of collecting is fast food memorabilia. There's a lot of crossover here — fast food collecting is extremely popular in its own right, and most fast food collectors will be looking for the Star Wars stuff.

Pizza Hutt Darth Vader box

Burger King produced three different sets (for each film) of four glasses each. The Star Wars set is worth the most, with each glass going for up to $10. Glasses from the other sets are usually worth half that amount. Again, if you're looking for the most popular item, look no farther than Boba Fett: The Empire Strikes Back glass with Darth Vader and Boba Fett is the most popular of all the fast food glasses.

Some fast food items were recalled shortly after their release because of safety concerns. Among them, the Exploding Darth Vader in a Taco Bell premium that coincided with the re-release of the films. Relatively few items were produced and now the piece is highly collectible.

The following checklist features some of the more interesting Star Wars non-toy items. Certainly, there are thousands upon thousands of items somehow related to Star Wars not listed here, but we thought we'd include items that are somewhat easy to find, or items that are so highly sought after that they couldn't be left out.

rian Semling has been active in the Star Wars memorabilia market since 1994. Beginning in 1996, he decided to dive into the hobby full time by opening Brian's Toys in his hometown of Fountain City, Wisc., partly as a source of income, and partly to continue his efforts to reclaim the collection he owned as a child.

"I sold all of my toys at a garage sale and had nothing left from when I was a kid," Semling says.

Like many Star Wars enthusiasts, Brian starting searching for Star Wars items again in the early '90s, slowly piecing together an impressive collection, mostly through science fiction memorabilia shows or mail-order businesses such as his own.

"I was amazed to find that there was actually a market in which people were buying and selling Star Wars items," he says.

Eventually, Semling had some duplicates, which he traded to other collectors for items he was missing. Slowly but surely, the business grew, and now it's a full-time job

Born in LaCrosse, Wisc., and raised in nearby Fountain City (pop. around 900), Brian still lives there and runs his business from his home while attending school at Wynaona State University.

When he's not busy selling Star Wars items or pursuing his degree in history, Semling enjoys lifting weights and watching the Packers pursue another Super Bowl title.

Contact Brian's Toys at W730 State Highway 35, Fountain City, WI 54629; (608) 687-7572-phone; (608) 687-7573-fax; bsemling@rconnect.com.
